Illusion of Lent

One of history's most well-known philosophical discussions was between Jesus and the Judean governor, Pilate. Judas, a disciple of Jesus, alerts authorities to his teacher's location, initiating three quick trials. During Pilate's inquisition, Jesus says the reason for his life is "to testify to the truth," and Pilate responds, "What is truth?"

The Greek word, alethia, and the Latin word, veritas, are translated into English as "truth," but I think the better translation is REALITY. At a very deep metaphysical spiritual-plane level, a conversation regarding illusions continues to allude Biblical scholars and humanity.

Science of Mind deals with thoughts, whether Spirit initiating ether into form, or humans manifesting from thought. The illusion that the mind of Spirit is different from the mind within each of us presents as the illusion that blocks us from spiritual vision. As each of us understands our Earthly purpose using concepts from A Course in Miracles, Kabbalah, and/or Christian theology, we innately know that there is One Mind in which we all have our being.

That is the Reality—the Unity of One Mind, and the illusion is every conceivable path rooted in separation. Living derivatively in dualism is the illusion, and the truth/alethia/veritas/reality that the Christ consciousness calls us to spiritually envision is: There is One Life, that Life Being the Source of All that Is....

Consciousness is always a unity, but our illusive mind categorizes the whole into conceptual parts. And in this mirage, the narrative to see Christ as separate from you and I perpetuates over and over in the time known as Lent, which culminates in an event that is so supernatural (The Resurrection) that the illusion of separateness justifies Christ becoming an atoning bridge. But as we are all One, no chasm exists, so no bridge is needed; therefore, the conversation between Pilate and Christ becomes a cyclical illusion that humanity continues to play out every day, year after year...
